The novel was adapted into a film called Hangwoman in 2016. Hangwoman is the first book in the legendary K.R. Meera (K. R. Prasad) Trilogy that continues with When God is not There and the recently released K.R. Meera 2. Plot In the morning, a convict is hanged. She is tied to the hangman's noose. The hangman's noose is tied to the railroad track. The noose is worn by a train that runs at a very high speed. The convict looks at the sky. She looks at the people who stand in a line along the side of the railroad track. She tries to think of something nice to say. The people standing in line are not looking. They are busy preparing the muck wagon to remove the body. The muck wagon is going to transport the body to the town. She has seen the man who is going to hang her. He is an evil man. He is a brutal man. He has an evil nature. He is a man who enjoys causing pain to others. He enjoys watching people suffer. He enjoys seeing people suffer. He enjoys seeing helpless people die. He enjoys hearing the last screams of the people who are hanging. She looks at the face of the hangman who is going to hang her. She looks at him and thinks of her own mother. Her mother is kind. Her mother is a good woman. Her mother is a good person. Her mother is a good person. Her mother is a good woman. Her mother is a good person. She is kind and warm and loving and sweet and caring. She is honest and a woman of substance. She is a woman who never lies. She is a woman who is always true. The convict remembers the day she met her mother. Her mother told her, "When I was your age, I also worked as a Hangwoman." The convict thinks of her mother and the hangman who is going to hang her and she can't think of a single nice thing to say. She can only think of her mother. She can't think of anything nice. She looks at the hangman. He is all alone. There are no other men near him. The convict looks at the crowd of people standing along the side of the railroad track. The crowd is quiet. All the people are quiet.
